I spent two years working as a Health Educator for the student run clinic, Imani, serving Sacramento’s underserved population. We made a huge impact on the community by offering free medical services. Somedays our clinic was so busy that we had to turn people away. On these days, I tried hard to serve as many people as possible, offering information about healthy living choices and providing information about resources. I worked alongside doctors, PAs and medical students, and I was able to do a lot of hands on care, such as taking blood pressure glucose checks. I learned a lot from this experience, and it solidified my desire to become a physician who wants to serve this population.
Every available Saturday, I eagerly served as a medical Spanish interpreter, and if needed, took the patient’s vital signs and preliminary review of systems in preparation for the volunteering medical student and doctors. The initial “good feelings” I had after a long clinic day were replaced with sadness. What was different between myself and our patients, many of whom were disabled, poor, undocumented, or people of color? As valuable as Imani is, it is a band-aid fix for a system that chooses not to afford basic healthcare rights to its people. It has galvanized me to change the system so that one day, people’s primary health concerns will be met by doctors and not hard-working, compassionate college undergraduates.
